No one is always happy. It is just a passing phase of one's life. It varies from time to time and place to place. It depends on certain people who you are close to. There are times when we are extremely happy or sorrowful. In most circumstances, our happiness is decided by certain moments in our life. Some light moments can really enliven our mood. The actions of our friends can make us happy or sometimes sorrowful. We must also realize that on every cloud there is a silver lining. This means that every sorrowful moment is followed by a period of joy and happiness.

Questions

The poem suggests that the experience of the dust of snow falling on the poet caused him to shift his perspective and find a moment of joy or hope in the midst of his troubles. So, it is possible that the poet was simply taking a walk or engaging in some other activity when he had this transformative experience.

Questions

The poem evokes a sense of black and white. Justify. //

The poem "Dust of Snow" by Robert Frost does have some elements that evoke a sense of black and white. Here are some reasons why:

Contrast: The poem contains contrasting images of darkness and light, with the "crow" and "hemlock tree" representing darkness, and the "dust of snow" representing light. This creates a visual contrast that can be associated with black and white.

Symbolism: The crow and the hemlock tree can be seen as symbolic of negative or dark elements, while the dust of snow can be seen as symbolic of positive or light elements. This reinforces the sense of black-and-white imagery in the poem.

Tone: The poem has a melancholic tone at the beginning, which can be associated with dark or black imagery. However, this tone shifts to a more hopeful and positive tone by the end of the poem, which can be associated with light or white imagery.
